

Post-Doctoral Employment e-Resources

Compiled by Dan Bullard

Most web sites for universities and organizations are permanent but some may disappear periodically. Though best efforts have been made to ensure easy understanding, names and listings are sometimes confusing, especially in terms of geography or web site name. In order to find all of the related sites, keyword search this document to find related links. Efforts have also been made to screen out positions totally unrelated to the discipline of history. For example, positions focused on the sciences have been excluded from the list. Additionally, there is some overlap between academic and non-academic listings. Though care has been taken to list strictly academic jobs in universities in one list, many jobs inside and outside of universities could be on either list. Many universities' job-search sites feature both academic positions and more general positions within the institution. For this reason, comprehensive searches of both listings is suggested. The web sites presented below are both aggregator web sites listing dozens or hundreds of subsidiary web sites and positions and single-institution web sites listing positions available through one organization or institution.

Neither I, nor York's Department of History or Graduate History Program, are responsible for the content offered by the web sites listed below.
